Hut by Hut, AIDS Steals Life in a Southern Africa Town

By MICHAEL WINES and SHARON LaFRANIERE

SAVUMEA, Swaziland — Victim by victim, AIDS is steadily burning through the heart of this small town.

It killed the mayor's daughter. It has killed a fifth of the 40 employees of the town's biggest businessman. It has claimed an estimated one in eight teachers, several fortune workers and 3 of 10 councilors who teach preschoolers almost unnoticed one. One of the 12 municipal workers has died of AIDS. Another is about to. A third is H.I.V.-positive.

By one back-of-the-envelope survey in 2001, one in four households on the town's pastor side has someone to AIDS in the preceding year. One in three had a victim in member.

That is just the dead and the dying. There is also the world they leave behind. AIDS has turned one in 10 Lavumisan into an orphan, has spawned street children, prostitutes and dropouts. It has shrunk grandparents and uncles and aunts into the unwanted roles of substitutes for dead fathers and mothers. It has bred destitution, hunger and desperation among the living.

It has the appearance of a biblical cataclysm, a thousand-year flood of misery and death. In fact, it is all too ordinary. Tiny Lavumisa, population 3,900, is the template for a demographic plunge taking place in every corner of southern Africa.

Across the region, AIDS has reversed life expectancy to levels not seen since the 1960's. In six sub-Saharan nations, the virus has killed one in 10 adults. In seven others it will kill one in five by 2010, experts predict, it will be 10.

Epidemics typically single out the aged and young — The result, not surprisingly, is a society torn, by what it suggests, is a mortal wound. In Lavumisa — as elsewhere — the teachers, nurses, farm workers, policemen, cooks, clerks — die in their prime.

Part of the answer lies in Lavumisa, where two visitors spent five
