ACADEMIC APPOINTMENTS

classes taught: CUA Arch 722 | practice management [lecture course]
The course explores business management for architects. Where other courses focus on the services that architects provide to their clients (such as design), this one focuses on what architects need to know to remain in business while providing those services. It addresses effective management of architectural projects, practices and careers in terms of marketing, finance and accounting, staffing, law, organizational structure, professional development, risk management, and negotiation. In addition, it reviews the history and current state of the profession and the procedures mandated by the standard industry contracts used by owners, design professionals, and contractors in the design and construction of buildings.

Arch 221 | Pre-design [studio course]

The first task in designing a project is finding out what is meant by "the project". In this course, students learn to define project problems in terms of mission, value, cost, planning, urban design, ecology, program, code, and life-cycle. Further, they learn to develop and propose design guidelines related to each, and learn to communicate their findings and recommendations to project stakeholders.
